Commentary

Equity and bond markets extended their losses in the quarter as central banks battled to control persistently high inflation with increasingly aggressive increases in interest rates. We are confident that rates of inflation will eventually fall but the great unknown is where they will settle, especially if a wage price spiral has become embedded. Meanwhile, rising interest rates and surging prices are taking a mounting toll on consumer spending and economic growth and fears of recession are escalating. After years of offering only miserly returns, though, yields on bonds have now risen to levels which are once again becoming attractive. The outlook for corporate earnings and therefore for equity markets in the short term is very uncertain but companies with strong balance sheets and dominant market positions are best placed to weather any economic downturn and will emerge stronger. Equities are, after all, investments intended for the long term.
